I support the most strenuous cleanup possible, more strenuous than any of your alternatives.

Just as our mothers said, "If it's worth doing, it's worth doing right."

The cleanup of the river is a monumental task, but very necessary. When all the workers and machines are assembled to do the job, then do the job, the whole job, and do it thoroughly. That will be a boost to jobs in the area, too, more employment is a good thing. Funding has to come from all sources available, including those companies responsible, if they are still around.

Their ability to pay should be based on financial examination by an outside agency, and not the word of the company involved.

Nature is the foundation of all life, and without a strong, healthy foundation the house will fall.
